ICT to Dental Software: Dental Practice Management Solutions

More examples available at SolutionSource Monday, June 21, 2009 There has been a lot written about the little white ball that closed the end of the Seattle City Council's May 11 public hearing to discuss the annexation of Seattle's downtown Eastlake neighborhood by a collective of the city's universities. That small white ball in a hearing room is called one of two City Council members who are not permitted to vote. When the ball was being juggled in the press, people started calling it "a dingy pink ball." Actually it was a gray ball, but it was shaped like a sphere, so in those first few minutes, the press were calling it "a dingy pink ball." However, the ball in question was not a dingy pink ball. It was a very smooth gray ball about the size of a Ping-Pong ball. Until that gray ball was dropped in the conversation, until someone started talking about the difference between a ping-pong ball and a ping-pong paddle, and that started the whole thing in motion. The dingy pink ball had done its work, the ball dropped to the Council so that they could vote. The ping-pong balls are about the size of a 32 ounce bottle of water, and they can be found at any county fair. The Council could vote by showing up at a meeting when they did not attend it. It's their ball. They can drop the ball at any time. It's a convenience, and it means that somebody could be voted out for missing a hearing, or worse. The Council could vote by showing up at a hearing when they attend it. They can't drop a ball there, but they can vote. Who knows? The ball might end up the Council will have to make an election night ruling. This ping-pong ball was dropped as a matter of simple negotiation, not to change the status quo. What's changed is that there are four Council members on a ticket. They've never voted together. But they could start moving towards agreement. In Seattle, the school district has a "letter of intent," which is a form of negotiation. The letter of intent for the universities annexing Eastlake is probably in the
