Mobile phase additives such as ionic liquids have been shown to be effective in the analysis of proteins and peptides by isoelectric focusing (IEF) and reversed-phase liquid chromatography (RPLC). Utilization of non-aqueous buffers in IEF and RPLC is accompanied by undesirable effects such as hydrolysis of labile ionic groups and acid-base artifacts. Ionic liquids have also been used as a support for nucleic acids and DNA. In particular, ionic liquids used in 2-D IEF applications have also been studied as buffers for DNA separation in second dimension. Ionic liquids were utilized as microelectrophoretic separations media to separate DNA denatured by heat, UV radiation, and oxidizing chemicals. Low buffer concentrations of ionic liquids were shown to be effective in reducing protein artifacts in 2-D IEF. The use of ionic liquids as 2-D separations media was demonstrated in combination with on-line Fenton oxidation as an alternative to the standard non-aqueous technique. Anion-exchange chromatography with silica-based ionic liquids as buffers or ligands has been used for protein separation and fractionation. However, there remains a need for improved separation media. In particular, there is a need for ionic liquids that are more compatible with organic solvents. Described herein are new tri-alkylphosphate analogs of 1-alkyl-3-methylimidazolium salts, their characterization and utility in separation. The materials of this disclosure are highly compatible with, and are stable in the presence of, aqueous buffers and with organic solvents. Described herein are tri-alkylphosphate ionic liquids that are stable and compatible with a variety of organic solvents, such as aqueous buffers and buffers with neutral organic cosolvents. The ability to couple ionic liquids with organic solvents contributes to the significant improvement in compatibility of ionic liquids with organic solvents and buffers relative to imidazolium ionic liquids.A North Carolina sheriff told the Charlotte Observer that his department arrested 48 people -- including 42 with outstanding warrants -- when he "went on a targeted enforcement mission." And that was just on Saturday. No, really. "I have 17 deputies all over this county, doing whatever we can, whatever we need to do to ensure that this community is safe," Franklin County Sheriff
